G.

G, g, indecl. n. or (on account of litera) f. The seventh letter of the Latin alphabet, but which did not originally belong to the Latin orthography, its place being supplied by C; hence on the Columna Rostrata LECIONES, MACISTRATOS, EXPOCIONT, (pu) CNANDOD, PVCN (ad), CARTACINIENSIS, for legiones, etc.; hence, too, the archaic form ACETARE for agitare (v. Fest. p. 23 Müll. N. cr.), and the still common abbreviation of the names Gaius and Gnæus, C. and Cn.—As a later date (acc. to Plut. Qu. Rom. p. 277 D and 278 E, by means of a freedman of Spurius Carvilius Ruga, about the beginning of the second Punic war) a slight graphic alteration was made in the C, which introduced into the Roman orthography the letter G (on the old monuments C): thus we have in the S. C. de Bacchanal. MAGISTER, MAGISTRATVM, FIGIER, GNOSCIER, AGRO; on the other hand, GNAIVOD PATRE PROGNATVS on the first Epitaph of the Scipios, which dates before that time, indicates either incorrectness in the copying or a later erection of the monument.

As an initial, g, in pure Latin words, enters into consonantal combination only with l and r; and therefore in words which, from their etymology, had the combination gn, the g was rejected in the classical age, and thus arose the class. forms nascor, natus, nosco, novi, notus, narus, navus, from the original gnascor, gnatus, gnosco, etc.; whereas in compounds the g again makes its appearance: cognatus, cognosco, ignarus, ignavus.—An initial g is dropped before l in lac from γάλα (GALACT), and prps. in lucuns, if this has arisen from γλυκύς.

As a medial, g combines with l, m, n, r, although it is sts. elided before m in the course of formation; so in examen for exagmen from agmen; in contamino for contagmino (from con-TAG, tango). Before s the soft sound of g passes into the hard sound of C, and becomes blended with the s into x (v. the letter X); though sts. the g (or c) is elided altogether, as in mulsi from mulgeo, in indulsi from indulgeo. So too before t, as indultum from indulgeo.

As a final, g was only paragogic, acc. to Quint. 1, 7, 13, in the obsolete VESPERVG (for vesperu, analogous with noctu; v. Spald. ad loc.).

Commutation took place most freq. between g and c; v. the letter C: with j in mejo from mingo, major from MAG (magis, maximus).—By assimilation, g was produced from b and d in aggero, suggero, aggero, etc., from ob-gero, subgero, ad-gero, etc.

As an abbreviation, G denotes Galliarum, Gallica, gemina, Germania, etc.; and sometimes Gaius (instead of the usual C); v. Inscr. Orell. nos. 467; 1660; 4880: GPRF, genio populi Romani feliciter, Inscr. Orell. no. 4957. Cf. Schneid. Gramm. I, pp. 267-274; 454 and 485-492.

H.

H, h, n. indecl. or (on account of litera) f., the eighth letter of the Latin alphabet, the weakest guttural, the sign for which is borrowed from the Greek, in which H was the oldest form of the spiritus asper, corresp. to the Latin H-sound. This affinity to the Greek spiritus gave rise to doubts, even among the ancients, as to whether the Lat. H. was properly a letter or not: si H litera est, non nota, Quint. 1, 5, 19; cf. also, H literam, sive illam spiritum magis quam literam dici oportet, etc., Gell, 2, 3, 1.

As an initial and medial, H may be combined with any vowel, though, as long as the language was a living one, the orthography, in this respect, was unsettled; thus we have honus, honera for onus, onera, harundo for arundo, and even hac for ac (Inscr. Orell. no. 23.), and, on the other hand, aruspex for haruspex, erus for herus, ercisco and erctum for hercisco and herctum, ahenеus and aēneus, Annibal and Hannibal, Adria and Hadria, etc.; v. Gell. l. l.—As a sign for the aspiration of the consonants c, p, r, and t (as in Greek the aspirates χ, φ, and θ were originally designated by KH, ΠH, and TH), H first came into use in the seventh century of Rome; cf. C. Or. 48, 160; and see the letter C. p. 232 a.—As a final, h occurs only in the interjections ah and vah.

In the formation of words, h was changed into c before t, as tractum from traho, vectum from veho; and coalesced with s into x, as traxi, vexi; cf. also onyx from onych-s; v. the letter X.

As an abbreviation, H. denotes hic, hæc, hoc, hujus, etc.; habet, heres, honor, etc. HH. heredes. H. AQ. hic acquiescit. H. B. M. heredes bene merenti. H. C. Hispania citerior or hic condiderunt or consecraverunt.

☞ The abbreviation HS. for sestertium does not strictly belong here, because H is not the letter of that shape, but the numeral IIS. crossed; v. sestertius ad init.

I.

I, i, n. indecl. or (on account of litera) f., the ninth letter of the Latin alphabet, a vowel; for even the old grammarians distinguished it from the consonant J; see the letter J.—The short i is, next to ĭ (see that letter), the least emphatic of the Latin vowels, and serves, like the Greek o, as a connecting sound in forming compounds: aerifodina, aeripes, altitudo, altisonus, aviticenus, homicida, etc.—The vowel i is most closely related to u, and hence the transition of the latter into the former took place not only by assimilation into a following i, as similis, together with simul and simultas, facilis, together with faculand facultas, familia, together with famul and famulus, but also simply on the principle of euphony; so that, from the class. age onward, we find i written in the place of the older u: optimus, maximus, finitimus, satira, lacrima, libet, libido, etc., instead of the earlier optumus, maxumus, finitumus, satura, lacruma, lubet, lubido, etc.; cf. also the archaic genitives, CERERVS, VENERVS, HONORVS, NOMINVS, etc., for Cereris, Veneris, Honoris, nominis, etc., the archaic orthography CAPVTALIS for capitalis, etc.—For the relation of i to a and e, see under those letters.—Examples of commutation between i and o are rare: agnitus, cognitus, together with notus, illico from in loco, the archaic forms ollus, ollic for ille, illic, and inversely, sispes and sispita for sospes and sospita. —Cf. Schneid. Gramm. I, p. 18 sq.
